etc. In cities all family washing is sent out of the house to be done, and in the country and villages the operation is gone through with but once or twice a year. Breakfast and supper are both simple meals, requiring little care in preparation.

"The American mother, too, gives far more attention to her children than the average English mother. It is the exception in this country if the mother does not have her baby and younger children sleep in her room, so that she may attend to their wants in the might. The American mothers often bathe their children themselves, and not only dress them, but largely help make their clothing, and have them about them all day. The children eat at the table with the grown members of the family.

"An English mother is very poor if she has ner child sleep with her. If she has a nurse, the nurse has entire charge of the child. It is an unheard-of thing for an English woman to be fred up at home by the care of young children. Those of means will travel on the continent and leave several small children and a young babe at home in the charge of servants. Here, if a woman should go off travelling and leave ber little children behind, she would be considered devoid of the first instincts of maternity.

"In Rely, and in some localities in France, it is customary to send children into the country to be nursed till two or three years old, and thus relieve the mother of all responsibility of their care. Fancy an American mother who would consent to part with a little one, only occasionally visiting it from its birth till old enough to walk and talk!

"As I said, therefore, the American housewives are certainly the hardest-working women on earth. Their family duties are not only multifarious, but they manage to keep shreast of the times and to be litelifigent in regard to all topics of the day. Yes, when I look around at my country-women I am convinced they are the brightest in the world."

The authorities of the town sent the medical examiner to the scene, who could do nothing but issue a burial permit. It was a wild, weird scene, the funeral on that sectuded mountain side, the calmylsaged husband and spiritual elder, surrounded by his children and rehgious followers, with the last sad flus to the body.

CARREN OF A SPENDTHRIFT.

It was not until yesterday afternoon, where on application to bail M. W. Balle was made in the Jefferson Market Police Court by Connellor C. A. L. Golder, that it was known in the court that the only surviving son of the composer, Michael William Balte, had been in a cell on a petty charge of assault and battery since last Monday. On that day a short, spare, symmetrically built man of middle are, with keen but honest olive eyes, a German cast of features, thin, krown hair, and a stubble beard, and who was in the garb of a working man, was arraigned before Justice Patterson. Court-Officer Joseph A. Gardener had affected him at 519 Broome street on the complaint of Eilen Thompson, of No. 90 Varick street, who made affidavit that on Saturday the prisoner had knocked her dyck, then at the height of his fame, and living in great state in the then fastinousble quarter of Blockfrive. On one occasion he left her forth into a long gillery attached to the house, wherein were hing a number of his pictures. Remarking the writeness of the foces, she asked him why he painted them so pale. "I paint for time," he replied. "Time will darken them, and posterity will thank me for it." This atterance, proving at once his knowledge, wisdom, and jealousy for his reputation, was repeated by Hudson to Sir Joshua Reynelds, whose misster he was; Sir Joshua rold it to his pupil, James Northeote, who repeated it to poor Renjamin Havden; by Hayden it was told to W. P. Frith, and by Mr. Frith it was repeated to Seymour Lucas. Thus, without the medium of ink or paper, has there been handed down an interesting statement of one of the world's greatest men, intered before the civil wars huried Charles I. from his throne.

[Springheld Republican-]
The war was fought to save the Union. It was fought to keep in the Union the southern people who were trying to secode. As a means to that end, slavery was abolished. But many people seem to think that the war was fought to drive the southern people away, to put them under ban, to deprive them of equal privileges with the rest of the Union, and to make them subject previnces. Every evidence that the southern people were really brought back and restored to their rightful place in the Union, that the robel brigadiers are now citizens, as good as Union brigadiers, and as such are elected to office and serve their constituents with the same fidelity as do public sachusetts hearts by his honorable welcome to southern brethren, and his earnest warning against northern intolerance, in such words as these:

"The natural instinct of the people everywhere is toward peace and good-will, and were it never thwarted by party intrigue we should be much nearer to a perfect Union, such as these men fought for, than we are to-day. The occasional firebrands thrown in the path of reconciliation are from the hands of those who, while the battle lasted, sought bond to bomb-proof" positions in the rear, and they no more represent the lighting men of the South than the plunderlar politicians who have spoiled them represent the true hearts at the North. I firmly helieve that when the gallant men of Lee's army surrendered at Aoponattox, they followed the example of their herotechief and with their arms laid down forever their disloyalty to the Union. Take care then lest you rebel by injustice, or suspicion, or even by indifference, the resuming love of men who speak with pride of that flag as four flag. It was to make this a happy reduited country, where every man should be in reality free and equal before the law, that our contrades fought, that our burothers fell. They died not that New Earland might prosper or that the West might thrive. " They died for their country—for the South no less than for the North."

Once again, at the Lexington celebration, he struck the same high acy again,
